

WELLESLEY COLLEGE
Wellesley, MA

Wellesley is a women's college and one of the leading undergraduate, Liberal Arts colleges in the U.S. Founded in 1875, Wellesley College has been a leader in liberal arts and the education of women for more than 125 years. The College's 500-acre campus near Boston is home to 2,300 undergraduate students.

ENVIRONMENTAL STUDIES PROGRAM: The Environmental Studies Program invites applications for a tenure-track position in environmental studies at the rank of Assistant Professor to begin in fall 2006. A Ph.D. in environmental studies or a related field is expected by the start of employment. We seek an individually broadly trained in environmental studies with teaching interest and a research profile in the social sciences. The successful candidate will be expected to regularly teach an interdisciplinary mid-level environmental social science course with a focus on policy, and will also teach in our team-taught introduction to environmental studies and our capstone seminar for ES majors, as well as elective courses in her or his area of expertise. A wide range of research interests will be considered, including (but not limited to) environmental justice, comparative or American environmental or science policy, resource economics, environmental planning and human geography.

Applications, including a cover letter, a statement of teaching experience, interests and philosophy, a statement of research interests, a curriculum vitae and three letters of recommendation from individuals familiar with your academic background, should be sent, in either Word or pdf format, to essearch@wellesley.edu. In addition, copies of graduate transcripts should be sent to Prof. William F. Coleman, Department of Chemistry. Applications will be accepted until November 1, 2005 or until the position is filled.

Review of applications will begin on November 1, 2005.